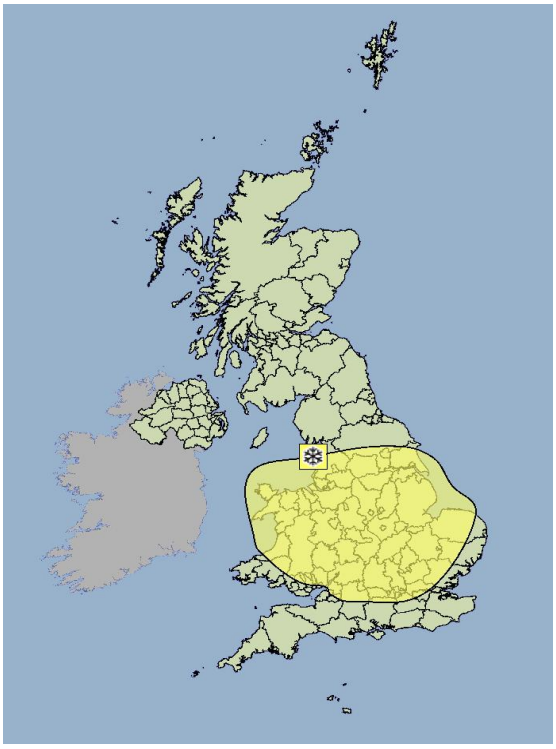
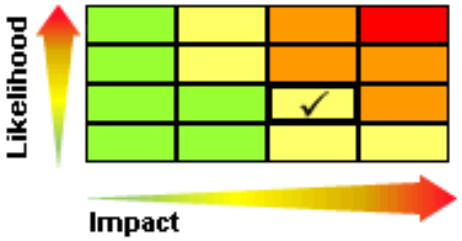
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
A spell of snow is expected on Sunday. This snow starts to develop during the early hours of Sunday, with the heaviest and most persistent snow likely during Sunday morning. Within the warning area, 1-5 cm of snow is possible quite widely with up to 10 cm in places, perhaps more on hills. It is likely that along the southern edge of the warning area snow will turn to rain at times. Meanwhile, in the far north of the warning area, some places may see relatively little, if any, snow.

This update adjusts the southern boundary southwards to affect more of south Wales, areas adjoining the M4, and parts of London.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow

Valid from 04:00 on Sun, 10th Dec 2017 until 23:55 on Sun, 10th Dec 2017

A spell of heavy snow is possible over parts of England and Wales during Sunday.

The snow could lead to road, rail and air travel delays, with the potential for vehicles to become stranded or public transport to be cancelled. Rural communities with limited access routes could become cut off.
